General Comment

Current copyright law promotes innovation and thriving within the United States creative market. To grant AI companies an exception to copyright would be devastating and cause irreparable harm to the great lead our country has in the world's creative economy. Currently AI companies train as they please on anything they can find, from our country, from other countries, everything and anything. And the best they can come up with is knockoffs and watered down versions of existing creative work. It is necessary for both the incentivizing of innovation and the future of fairness in the creative economy that copyright not be disassembled in a bleak attempt to outcompete our own American artists and musicians.
