General Comment

When I was growing up, plagiarism was considered a BAD thing.

The truth is, it's still considered a bad thing... if you're an individual doing it. For some backwards reason, the USA believes that people with enough money can get away with anything, and in the USA corporations are treated as people. But copyright, though flawed, is the only protection ordinary people have against the greed of others who will use material and art created by artists in whatever way for their own ends.

And now, the current massive source of greed of those who want to use art for their own ends is so-called Generative AI, colloquially called Plagiarism Machines.

These companies have made massive investments (or wagers) in these Plagiarism Machines, and are pinning their future wealth on supposed windfalls from them. But they're trying to force a windfall despite the general public not wanting what these companies are trying to sell them, and despite them trying to illegally gain access to massive amounts of art (visual and textual) that they did not create and have no right to so that their Plagiarism Machines can make more convincing forgeries and acts of plagiarism. In a sane world, they would be broken up and their leaders would be imprisoned for this. At the very least, as per the invisible hand of the market, they would rightfully go out of business.

Instead, they are now begging for assistance they do not deserve and have not earned. They made foolish bets, and they lost those bets. They should at the VERY least, go out of business. To ensure this, they should be blocked from getting the laws rewritten so that they can steal and profit from it.

Copyright laws in the USA are imperfect, and allowing their naked greed to enrich them would only make the laws even more imperfect. We are supposed to strive to make things BETTER, not WORSE, and allowing the Plagiarism Merchants to get rich over fraud will only make things worse.
