

PUBLIC SUBMISSION

As of: March 21, 2025
Received: March 14, 2025
Status: [REDACTED]
Tracking No. m89-kdkw-poq7
Comments Due: March 15, 2025
Submission Type: API

Docket: NSF_FRDOC_0001

Recently Posted NSF Rules and Notices.

Comment On: NSF_FRDOC_0001-3479

Request for Information: Development of an Artificial Intelligence Action Plan

Document: NSF_FRDOC_0001-DRAFT-1649

Comment on FR Doc # 2025-02305

Submitter Information

Name: Tyler Mayfield

[REDACTED]
[REDACTED]

General Comment

By allowing AI to no longer heed by copyright law, this will irreparably damage hundreds of thousands of livelihoods. When an algorithm takes over art production, it isn't merely soulless but puts the jobs of animators, scriptwriters, artists of both physical and digital means, musicians, and game designers in danger. Being outsourced to a machine means these Americans are no longer getting paid for their work and may become financially unstable.

It would also damage any industry related to art on all levels from the humble internet artist on social media to the largest media corporations in the nation including Disney and DreamWorks. That has the potential to worsen the economy itself.

As for fears regarding the safety of the US government and its people, AI being held accountable to copyright violations will very likely not have an effect on this. The death of copyright law does not serve the interests of the American people or the state itself, rather it serves those who own AI companies which will come at the cost of the average American. They seek to fill their own pockets rather than aid the nation.

The final reason is the cultural impact. The usage of AI would make art redundant, and the development of new art is foundational to a culture as much as language and background. The ubiquitous culture of the US would go into decline as "slop content" entirely overtakes anything made by hands and souls. The US is frequently said to not have a culture, which presently is not remotely accurate. However, allowing an algorithm to steal art and use it for itself would result in the US losing the massively influential culture it currently possesses.