General Comment

Generative AI, in addition to having no practical use applications beyond putting artists and writers out of work as well as using staggering amounts of resources to function at all, is built entirely on the back of stolen content. If ownership rights of creative work are to mean anything ever again, this planet-burning plagiarism engine cannot be allowed to freely steal the work of real artists in order to smash it into the digital equivalent of paste.

"private sector AI innovation" is a hilarious contradiction of terms and if their business model requires wholesale theft of other people's copyrighted material in order to operate, it does not deserve to operate, period.
