General Comment

The United States has a thriving arts community, and especially in the film industry's case, is one of our greatest exports in terms of money and culture. These artists creating things in our country deserve protections from AI stealing and using their work.

It's worth noting that the LLM AI industry only makes money on the notoriously fickle stock market, and has generated far, far less money on its own due to the immense operating costs of each request. In other words, it's a losing bet, and someday soon, I believe this will become clear.

Lastly, it's always easy to tell when art was generated by AI, and whenever I make that determination from an ad, I think the company using it is trashy for not simply paying an artist.
