General Comment

Allowing big tech companies to take whatever they want as long as it "trains their models" is a gross and blatant violation of nearly every IP copyright law known to man. It is legalized theft being used to create lesser, meaningless images and sounds as opposed to art.

Furthermore, there exists a very obvious loophole - that if any theft of IP is fine as long as it's to train a LLM, then what is to stop the companies running these models from having their "content" stolen as well? Where do the protections begin and end? Is the average hardworking artist not afforded the same protections giant corporations get?

How will we deal with media companies all over the world inevitably pulling their output from US markets once their works can be stolen with impunity? What will we do when American art, once at the forefront of the worldwide industry, gains a reputation for being cheap, disposable, unoriginal, and outright stolen?

These attempts to remove guardrails are ill-considered and fueled by a desire to satisfy shareholders and boards of directors, not actual individual human artists. This is, of course, par the course with these companies. The technology has already done horrific things to the art world in a few short years and it will only continue to do so. When we have no more Norman Rockwells, this will be why.

You have the power to stop this. You probably won't because ultimately sabotaging American art is good for your bottom lines, but I plead that you tap into what little sense of conscience you have to not participate, or worse yet, facilitate the demise of 200+ proud years of outstanding American artistic expression and culture.
