General Comment

Hello.

I find the very idea that large learning models, or "AI" as they have been misnamed, will provide any benefit to society asinine. Machines like this have been rotting any service they have been rattled into since chatgpt was first introduced. They worsen the usability of anything that uses them greatly, because you might as well have hired a chimpanzee to do the work. Hell, you might even get a better result. AI does not understand human language whatsoever, has no concept of truth or facts, and everything it puts out isn't even a best guess.

Even from a corporate profit AI doesn't make sense. It is expensive to develop, never turns a profit, and makes everyone's life harder because it pisses around and leads you on wild goose chases, where a human would actually be able to understand a problem in the real world and as such might be able to fix it. The only people it benefits are upper and middle management who spend their time putzing around with worthless busywork anyway.

To artists, AI represents an existential threat. While I do believe that artists will have a place in society even if AI gets widely adopted, their prices will skyrocket just so they can survive, thereby starving out a part of society that once flourished. Who knows if most would even decide to hang on after that. Answer me this, would you hang up a portrait painted by an AI? With the deformed hands and limbs, the unsettling and uncanny expression, the art style so devoid of care or the human experience that comes through real art that it becomes hideous simply from the apparent emptiness of it? I thought not.

AI is a product that is less than worthless, being sold by tech developers who seek only profit to the detriment of all else. The people that make this s&^% have no care for their fellow man, or they would have committed suicide out of shame of being involved in this. AI makes everyone's lives harder that it touches. Hell, beyond the principle of it, the slop these machines pump out is ugly as sin. The text is jumbled, garbled, or otherwise nonsensical and stupid, the art is so soulless you feel your soul being sapped away just by looking at it, and AI assistants make work harder by their mere presence by slowing down workflow and even the devices forced to run them. I haven't even mentioned the effect AI is having on America's youths, who cannot yet tell how horrible this thing is. They are having their minds turned to mush by a machine that tells them they don't have to think anymore. There does not yet exist a way to express how much I, and I'm sure most everyone else, hates AI with every synapse in our brains. Anything you can call this piece of s&^% "industry" is somehow too kind. To finish up, the executive order the conman in chief, Trump, signed is baldfacedly stupid, harmful, and probably even violent. I won't pretend to understand Trump's reasoning for most of the things he does. He probably went senile years ago and everything he does now is fueled by delirium and a sense of familiarity from his younger days of bluster and bullying. Besides, I try not to care about the motives of nazis, but instead to oppose them on everything they attempt.

I should hope that I have made very clear by now that AI poses no benefit to anything whatsoever, be it corporate or artistic. This horrid leech on the underbelly of society must be ripped off and stomped into the dirt if we want any of the people who call this land home to have a future with even an iota of hope in it. I can only hope the people who read this will listen and heed my warning. And if not, may the devil have mercy on you, because a kind god would look down upon you with only chagrin and hatred. Keep the disease of AI out of our society. Good day.
