General Comment

What is the point in creating art if companies can steal your work, run it through a machine, and profit, while you get nothing? Copyright protections exist to protect original ideas. Generative AI works are not original by definition. I also can't see large IP holders like Disney, which employ large swathes of people, taking the unauthorized use of their IP lying down. Protecting AI companies from the consequences of their actions is not the business of government.

On a personal note, I'm a teacher. How can I realistically make the case that students should think creatively if their creativity will be stolen by big tech, and they'll receive no benefit?
