General Comment

AI technology is based on theft from how it works to how it is used. It is theft when companies train their AI on data that is being used without permission, payment, contract, or even knowledge, and it is theft when the trained AI model is used to replicate that stolen work to avoid having to pay the trained data's originators for the end product.

The idea that this company should be exempt from copyright law just because their company depends on theft to function is sickening. Should a would-be hitman be exempt from homicide laws because the hitman business model relies on homicide?
