General Comment

I do not want nor believe AI companies should have the ability to access and use copyrighted material to train on. It completely disrespects the intellectual protections artists and creatives are promised as well as their time, hard work and expertise. It is a flagrant attempt by genAI companies to bypass the commitment and skill building that all artists and creatives invest in, in order to create the visual art, design, music, photography, film, etc. that we all engage with everyday. No artist's work and style should be able to be shamelessly copied by a machine and used by companies to shirk paying the people whose skills have been stolen. And to be frank, at best, AI excels at quantity over quality. But there is a point at which quantity holds little value and I have watched in disappointment as genAI floods the internet with content that holds none of the joy of human connection and understanding, nor any true mastery of artistic technique. Instead, it has begun to clog up the places that once made real artist's work accessible, instead burying it in piles of poor imitations. And what a disservice to the pride, joy, and human truths that real art and artists bring to our communities. In actuality, those who use genAI in this way should be punished for their flagrant stealing, willful ignorance of artists' copyright protections and underhanded, deliberately sneaky, changes in online agreements made to bypass artists intellectual protections. For the sake of yourselves and the people you represent, do not allow these companies to convince you that their soulless slop is worth the betrayal of the real people and artists you represent.
