General Comment

As a owner of a company in arts and entertainment, AI companies, such as OpenAI should be given no legal exemption to existing copyright laws.

They should not be granted the ability to steal data from millions of people across the world. They should only be allowed to use data that they have purchased the rights to train their models on.

Creation of such an exemption erodes the strength of existing copyright laws intended to protect works created by individuals, small business owners, and larger organizations.
