General Comment

I firmly believe that copyright laws MUST apply to any materials used to train AI models. While AI is useful, it depends on novel work made by humans. Work that has been historically produced with the understanding that the owner retains the rights to use and make money off that work. If an AI can copy the homework of hardworking Americans for free, it would undercut the value of creating new work for the AI models to continue to train on. Who would pay for the labor needed to create new works? I firmly believe these copyright protections in the case of AI training are good for skilled laborers, good for the AI models, and good for America. Please think carefully before giving away someone else's work for free. Thank you very much for reading.
