General Comment

Hey, do you realize what you're doing with this? Like, are you aware of just how many people — not just individuals but also entire companies — you're going to be massively harming with this? Do you really want humanity to be devoid of things that actually make us human and make life worth living and instead just make us all have stitched together remnants of pre-existing stolen and plagerized works with zero effort or meaning or actual humanity behind them? You want the jobs of people like artists to become obsolete and raise the unemployment rate even higher than it already is? You prefer machine-generated slop over something with real quality to it? Is that what you're feeling here? Should all of the work you've ever done in your life be rendered meaningless and stolen from you and credited to many others who barely lifted a finger? Should you be fired for inadequate machines to take your place for no reason other than they can? All perfectly legally, without you being able to do a single thing about it? Should art museums just be replaced with junkyards of things that no one wants to even look at? Should schools stop bothering to teach writing or art because it doesn't matter anymore? Should we stop making movies that have any emotion or effort in them because AI can produce them too? Shows? Books? How about clothing and costume designers? Architectures? Engineers? You want to live in a building that's as structurally sound as some mindless program's disjointed generative images deem it to be instead of something human beings tested and constructed and illustrated based on decades of education and experience they have on their side, not to mention their personal knowledge of what fellow humans enjoy and how to maintain their safety? I could go on! Doing this is just opening the door for a meaningless, incredibly unsafe, and altogether utterly lifeless existence. If starving homeless people can't even get food they can't afford without being arrested, why should people who already have plenty of money be allowed to freely steal things they don't even need to take? This shouldn't even be a debate. It's very clearly morally wrong, not to mention just plain illogical and unjust altogether. You need to put an end to this immediately before you create a disaster you can't undo.
