General Comment

I have worked in graphic design for several years. Changing the way copyright works to coddle generative AI models is a double standard for human artists and opens their work up to theft by these companies. Additionally, what if a company that prints shirts or other merchandise is given AI assets that are influenced enough by a copyrighted source image that the original artist has grounds for a C+D or a lawsuit? Restructuring copyright to benefit AI would put the onus of companies like mine to vet stolen assets generated by AI while the company that stole the art wouldn't be liable. This change benefits no one but the AI companies and I urge you not to give them special treatment
