General Comment

American media dominance and soft power have been the key to cultural dominance for decades, from our film industry to our television programs, streaming and books. The creativity of American thinkers, writers, artists, and creative experts has historically been a foundation upon which global media culture is built. The use of copyrighted works for training commercial AI products will kneecap a large sector of that economy, put millions out of jobs and further dilute and destroy America's soft power through media. It also continues to be proven even by open source and GDPR compliant models that the amount of data needed to continue to train large language models far surpasses the current available data of the entire internet. Outside of excessively narrow use cases such as analyzing large research datasets (for which models need to be specifically trained on similar research data) there has yet to be a consumer product of any relevance to emerge from OpenAI or Google with OpenAI losing $5bn in 2024. The idea of it being a "race for dominance" is a farce, it is a market of charlatans trying to feed investors the next iPhone when they lack even a basic proof of concept or data to demonstrate not only consumer demand but valuable usecase. There is no Killer App for these models and in most cases they have introduced more false data and errors into every business they have been applied to, costing companies billions cumulatively. Microsoft, Oracle and several others are cancelling data center contracts because they have seen the writing on the wall and allowing these companies to pillage the treasure trove of American Creativity will only drive creators and culture makers away from this country. This cannot be allowed to happen
