General Comment

At no point have companies like OpenAI presented anything demonstrating they have a greater right to an IP than the holder of said IP. Their claim that being held to the law would be burdensome is a demonstration of what their products are actually capable of, merely regurgitating words in an order based on probability, and a farce of a defense. If they cannot build a system without a gross violation of property rights, they have no right to continue working on that system. Any serious examination of what they have produced thus far reveals that, even while stealing from nearly everyone, they failed to make a functioning system, nevermind anything capable of knowledge. Just a computer that will confidently get math wrong. About the only thing they can do is violate the rights of others, generative false endorsements, and create obscene pornography of nonconsenting people, real people, adults and children alike.
