General Comment

Pillaging the intellectual property of artists, authors, and creative professionals without permission or compensation is not a business model, it is theft. And those who don't have skill, or knowledge base, to train effective models with their own original content definitely shouldn't get the green light to guide AI technology in general. Any public AI program or policy must follow international copyright law and ensure the tech benefits the public, as it can only function with the data we have collectively created. Otherwise, the federal government will be allowing a one-time extraction of value from millions of hardworking people, effectively putting them out of business, thus dealing a death blow to the American creative sectors and dooming us to rehashed mediocre entertainment until another nation eats our lunch.
