General Comment

While generative Ai has had useful application in science, such as cell research, it does not need to be able to recreate images, video, writing, coding, speech, or music.

Copyright exists to protect creatives and their work, as such, taking their work and copying it is plagiarism. Though these are not items that cannot be copyright-able, it still takes money away from creatives by offering a cheap imitation of their hard earned work for less money and effort. This would cause more economic problems of artists of all kinds, no matter how wealthy they are. This also does not prevent people from generating images, video, music, code, etc and claiming whatever they made isn't made by Ai.

There is already no consent when somebody decides to take an image and imitate it through Ai. Actual protections are already limited and have already been subject to plenty of lawsuits over Ai's legality for the lack of protections. All that would be accomplished by endorsing it would be the USA Government inviting more lawsuits that would take up precious time and money.

On top of everything stated, with generative Ai models like Deep Seek, that are free, the bubble for generative Ai has burst. Attempting to revive it now by handing it materials the USA has protected to the letter of the law up until now is a huge mistake. Companies just want to trick and use the government for hand outs that will go up in smoke and disappear with these companies that cannot stay afloat. By disregarding the law to allow this failing business venture to survive just a little bit longer, the USA will undermine its own legal authority. With how the state of USA's judicial branch is in, is it a good idea to keep bending it even further? This branch of the government is very important, and if it were to break, the USA Government will lose all authority it has over its citizens and its standing with other similar nations.

To summarize, this is a bad idea that ignores the law and will only end in judicial failure and lawsuits from some of the biggest companies within the United States of America. Reject.
