General Comment

Generative AI based on scraping and training on copyrighted work is a civilizational dead end. It destroys the incentive to learn or create.

Take the example of AI video game tips. I saw an article in techcrunch today hyping this as a way to enhance any game by having an AI helper. The problem is, all of these tips, all that information, has to come from somewhere, which requires humans playing the games and providing information for the AI to train on.

There must be strong copyright protection, and if generative AI cannot exist without circumventing that protection, then it should not exist at all.
