General Comment

Copyright, like trademarks, has been an enshrined right of creators for centuries, since Albrecht Dürer first sued a copyist in 1511 over the use of his artist's mark. If we as a country decide to allow one company, in this case OpenAI, to ignore the legal rights of creators to enforce their copyright then it will depress the economy by making creatives of all kinds decide to leave the country in order to protect their rights. This means major music labels, movie studios, publishing companies, fashion labels, etc, and the effects will be large scale loss of jobs and the decline of American soft power. There cannot be any exceptions made so that a company may ignore copyright. If that company cannot survive or produce a product without violating copyright it doesn't deserve to exist. It's not a viable company if breaking the law is its business model. A business like that is no better than organized crime.
