General Comment

I'm a freelance artist. My sole income is from my creativity. I'm fortunate that I have clients who are willing to buy my work. But if I have any aspirations to higher endeavors, that's now nearly impossible because of the number of creatives who have been severed from their jobs due to the proliferation of generative AI.

So many of my acquaintances, people who have never had any trouble getting work based on their bodies of work, have been unemployed for months or years because the companies pushing for wholesale thievery have replaced them with machines that do nothing but regurgitate garbage, fed by human ideas.

You cannot let these people continue to gut the heart and soul of our culture. They will take everything that is good and unique about the things that artists create, and they will grind it into unrecognizable hamburger. Rotting, homogenized, and braindead. And an entire class of people will have any sense of stability they have taken away.

You already hate the homeless, so why are you trying so hard to make more?
