General Comment

I am a writer and editor. My imagination is not only my great joy, but often my livelihood.

Large language models steal my work and the work of creative people like me to create wealth for their owners. They could not exist without the creative work of human beings. Their owners do not wish to pay those human beings for their efforts.

Creators should have the legal right to opt out of having their work included in LLM training; to be fairly compensated on an ongoing basis for the use of their work if they opt in; and to easily pursue legal action against any company that steals their work.

I create and write to share with other human beings. I do not want the products of that painstaking work used as fodder for someone else's machine without a choice in the matter, or an ongoing piece of the profits if I so choose. Anything less than this means the government is sanctioning theft on behalf of a wealthy few.
