General Comment

A.I. is theft from writers, artists, composers, journalists, researchers, and creators, as plainly and simply as if I were to plagiarize the work of another writer and pass it off as my own original work. It is quite literally a cheat code that encourages its users to take the easy way out rather than to challenge their own intellect, imagination, skills and talents to create any kind of finished work. It can steal the image, likeness or voice of an individual, to build composites and replace actors and performers in film and television, or replace models in print publications, stealing livelihoods and perhaps even paving the way for more nefarious uses outside traditional media.

Furthermore, because it gleans much of its, shall we say, raw data from the unregulated, unedited internet, it aggregates as much misinformation and disinformation as it does usable, reliable, worthwhile information. It lacks judgment and discernment. Simply put, like the worst neighborhood gossip, it'll believe anything it overhears, then turn around and try to pass it off as the gospel truth.

Artificial? Undoubtedly. Intelligent? Not so much as its creators and advocates would like us to believe. And it has at least as much potential to do harm as to do good. So to reward its developers with the freedom to take whatever they please without impediment, infringement or consequence would be no different than to leave a bank or a jewelry store unlocked overnight with the alarms and camera systems disabled. It's giving away the whole store to companies that have no inherent right to what's inside.
