General Comment

Allowing OpenAI or any AI company free reign to train their AI on any copyrighted work is a terrible mistake that fundamentally undermines creative works and the creative process. There is not enough media in the world to train generative AI to the level it would need to be for it to be more useful than it currently is, so all allowing this exception would do is give AI companies free permission to steal anything they want and face no repercussions if and when the AI bubble bursts. Even if the bubble doesn't burst, allowing these companies free reign of all copyrighted works eliminates the purpose of copyright in the first place and the people who put their hard work and labor into making these works.
