General Comment

Unpaid AI training is plagiarism. These interests are supported by almost unmatched speculative capital, and yet they demand the right to plagiarize the country's (and the world's) artists with no compensation.

It is an unthinkable precedent to set, that even some of the most skilled workers will have no defense against their work being stolen without pay.

These companies can easily afford to purchase works from artists, should they want. If the government gave away the right to corporations to take millions of hours of labor for no pay in any other industry, it would be slavery. The only difference in this case is perspective.
