General Comment

Allowing corporations to steal from writers, musicians, and filmmakers must not happen. Just because these documents are being stored and retrieved in a non-traditional way it does not make the use of these materials without remuneration a legal or fair practice.

These works are still being consumed and reproduced by a corporation for profit. Could I download these works and use them to teach students? Could I download them and sell them to consumers on a deck of a shuffled cards?

This is clear behavior that goes against copyright at its core for the benefit of a few corporations. It will only further immiserate the legal and cultural conditions of the United States. These well capitalized companies have the funds to purchase training materials if they choose. Will they be allowed to steal electricity next?
