General Comment

AI, or the technology that currently most prominently carries that name, is nothing more than a machine that launders intellectual property. It consumes copyrighted material and excretes derivative work stripped of the rights of the original creators. Consumers do not want this. It only exists independent of any monetization, because no one wants it. Linear progress in improvements require exponentially increasing training data. This is not viable technologically or economically. No special permissions should be granted to any company for the purposes of developing AI. People do not want this
