General Comment

"AI" is a tool that strips us of what makes us human. It lowers the capabilities of Americans, and it's continued development will ruin any chance of America staying an innovator and leader in the world. Machine Learning models for things like cancer identification, facial recognition, training robots, etc. these are fine. These are doing things that humans can't, or at least not in a reasonable amount of time or with as much accuracy. It's the chat bots and generators that the likes of Meta, Google, OpenAI, Apple, and X that are the issue. These artificial "intelligences" lack any actual intelligence, and therefore cannot discern when they are wrong. A recent study found that not only are these models providing incorrect information anywhere between 65-94% of the time, they are more wrong the more you pay, and are more confident in that incorrect answer.

As for the image generators, they fail to match up to human works, and so far there is no model that hasn't stolen from artist who are already struggling to survive off their works, and is taking away their livelihood. Only 10 years ago we were trying to sue children for burning a CD with millions in damages per case. Meanwhile these companies get to steal from literally everyone with no consequence? This technology is already at its limits for what it can do, and as more of this slop is released, it starts to poison itself. It's not sustainable, and it's not something we should sacrifice our innovation, creativity, and intelligence as a country to pursue. It will only lead to the fall of America.
