General Comment

This fails to state any actual regulatory policy. However, it is an openly communist effort to claim that the products of more than a hundred years of American creative labor belongs to the American public as a whole and can be therefore used, without any form of compensation, by these private companies. Copyright protections are enshrined in laws in this country and Executive Actions have no authority to simply strip those protections from the American public. This taking of the private property rights of millions of Americans comes from no legal power of the Executive Branch granted by either the Constitution or an Act of Congress, but rather through illegal efforts on behalf of a few massive corporations who do not benefit the American public in the same way that the millions of Americans who created these works being able to earn income - and thereby pay income TAX - would, nor does it place either the product of that theft or the funds made by selling the end result of running this copyrighted work through an algorithm which can only chop it up and feed it back to us, into circulation for the benefit of the citizens of the United States. Instead, it allows companies which are already the most profitable in the history of the world to steal from the pockets of United States citizens, selling the results of their theft back to the very people and country responsible for the creation of their product in the first place - not to mention to the rest of the world at a profit which the American public will never see a dime of. If you are going to say that the work of American creators is communal property, and that AI development is so important to national security and the wellbeing of the general public, why not simply fund such development in the form of a publicly held corporation whose profits would go directly to the American public?

A large language model or visual art generator, absent the copyrighted work of hundreds of millions of creative people, is a string of worthless code. American artists, writers, lawyers, business people, and others who created works which are protected by United States Copyright law either when published - a word which includes the act of posting something on the internet - or when those individuals had a reasonable expectation of privacy, such as when someone has saved their work in private cloud storage servers which they pay to use for their private business and personal documents have a right to benefit from their hard work, not be undercut by a communist sentiment taken only so far as it benefits a few oligarchs and strips those people of what little wealth remains. To claim that such rights are now the property of the United States Government and then for that government, having declared that the property rights of individuals no longer matter and that they are COMMUNAL property, to choose to hand them over to private companies who aren't paying a dime to either the individuals or the community (the government) is an obviously illogical act. No government actually seeking to protect the long-term interests of either itself or its citizens would take this action.

The only explanation for communistic appropriation of wealth only to hand the end result to a few private entities is a corrupt effort to steal from the American people the last true source of wealth that the average American has any chance of accruing. Already, Americans work more hours and days than a medieval peasant, and more than a third of childless Americans say they do not have and will not have children because they cannot afford to feed and house them. If this government is so concerned about American well being, and the US's declining birth rate, maybe stop trying to blatantly steal the few remaining things that United States citizens actually own. Instead, they are stealing from not only authors and artists, but also from lawyers, from research scientists, and from anyone else who is creating anything of actual value, and handing that all to a few private entities who have 0 oversight, 0 regulation, and 0 obligation to do anything that benefits anyone but their shareholders - a group which more and more is only those born into wealth, as no one can accumulate wealth through honest labor at the rates paid, or through intellectual labor as their work is stolen and fed into these models the instant it is created on programs owned by a major tech company, or saved to a cloud hosted by them. Removing this last source of both motivation for Americans to produce anything at all, and of potential wealth for the public at large, is a recipe for wide-spread suffering that in the end benefits no one.

To say nothing of removing any attempt to regulate the power use of these for profit companies, which is also part of removing any regulatory scheme intended to control or limit the development of "AI", a word with no definition and no clearly defined benefits for human beings living on this planet.
