General Comment

I don't know why I'm bothering, because on the one side is A Better World, and on the other is Money For Already Wealthy Fascists so we already know how this matter is going to be decided.

But obviously the Steals Artwork Machine That Exists To Deskill And Replace Artists should be subject to maybe some form of accountability. Maybe even just a little bit. Just a tiny bit of accountability. Maybe the people who make an entire business model based on stealing from people should face even the smallest amount of accountability, ever, at any point in their lives for the thousands upon thousands of lives they ruin, make worse, destroy, impoverish.

I'm an artist. We all see the writing on the wall, we understand the potentials of the technology, we already feel it absolutely devastating the environments we exist in and make our livings inside of.

I can't expect non-artists to understand the ecosystem they're completely obliterating, though I trust that they do, and they understand that replacing art with a machine that spits out big boobies will do great things for controlling the imaginations and political inclinations of the populace.

Whatever. Do it then, like, make the world worse to live in. Enjoy the slop world.

Transparently, most humans absolutely disdain art and artists. They want things to be useful, not meaningful. Why on earth would you ever risk feeling something, thinking about something, being vulnerable or introspective, being exposed to new ideas, discovering a part of yourself in a message or an aesthetic or an idea.

What humans evidently want is unchallenging arrangements of pixels, especially if it f*cks over as many people as possible to produce it. It's about making art useful, and useful to capital and to fascism specifically.

But on the extremely unlikely off chance that somehow, people decide they'd like the world to be one worth living in, then AI generation needs to be subject to strict copyright law.

By all means, build the slop machine again. We know you will, it's literally all you care about, it's all you want to do, it's the reason you were born -- to make the world worse, make the slop machine. Just pay the people who you forced to build it without their explicit consent so they can finish out the rest of their lives on this d*sh*t planet with dignity and enough money to rent a car to sleep in.

Stupid world. Absolute waste of my life to have devoted my time, effort, love and attention to learning a skill for myself and for humanity that's inevitably going to be replaced by Big Titty Global Warming Machine. Grats on the failed planet.
