General Comment

AI as we know it has been an unchecked tool for theft, corruption, and fraud. The AI pushed by major corporations and fraudulent start-ups is not AI as it is traditionally known. It's a mass of wasteful calculations that relies almost entirely on stolen works from hard working Americans, hard working people from countries America is allied with, and companies based in America and allied countries.

The fact that this AI tech can only function by stealing what is NOT licensed for use in another product, especially competing products, not only proves it's faulty and fraudulent tech, but that this is normalizing selective IP theft. This administration has the opportunity to make history with the biggest crackdown on blatant fraud by enforcing already existing laws on companies running the most public of cons. However, failing to do so will undoubtedly etch this administration in the annals of history as being as corrupt as those companies and too incompetent to tackle even the most obvious criminals.

Bolstering this tech in its current path will not only further damage the economy as the goal of the tech is to clearly eliminate jobs. The Jobs Report is the most obvious tell of an administration's successes, and eliminating more jobs will guarantee both mid-term losses, but also massive losses in 2028. If the companies behind this tech are as innovative as they claim to be, they will find ways to work with existing laws—ones they utilize when they benefit them—instead of circumventing them.

If Chinese companies wish to do business with America and its allies, the goal should be to require them to obey the same laws as the countries their products are distributed to. If they can't, a complete ban on them should be immediately levied. Participating in a global marketplace means adhering to the laws of the countries a company wants to do business in; not demanding that a country change its laws to suit the foreign interest.
