General Comment

An an illustrator and artist of other digital mediums, I know with all of my creative heart that stealing works from artists, creators, and whatever other designations need to be included on the subject of those who take the time to create something from nothing is wrong, both ethically and morally. If AI is to exist solely from mimicking and assimilating the hard work and immutable brilliance of human beings, it cannot be included as a part of the creative process, as it violates the very ideal of copyright, trademark, and the ownership of any work created outside of a machine throwing some ideas together until it looks good enough.

If the United States truly wants to lead the world with regards to artificial intelligence, we must innovate in ways to use AI to truly create better end products while leaving the work of artists and creators alone.
