This is abhorrent; if an AI model can not be created without violating established copyright laws or infringing on the unique creations of independent content creators than it does not deserve to be created. This is akin to theft being not only excused but sanctioned because the means of that theft might prove useful to future thieves to improve their skills at thievery. This is also a massive waste of resources - allowing a failure of a technical product and its burdensome development process to be foisted on the government. Allowing this to continue is unethical and inefficient, values I hoped the current administration would have more interest in holding.

The reported and hypothetical potential of AI has blinded individuals to the obvious scams the developers of such products are currently exposing our government to. This is garbage and needs to be discarded readily before the rights of millions of Americans are sacrificed for the profit of charlatans and con men in the AI industry, notably OPEN AI.
