Executive Order 14179 of January 23, 2025, "Removing Barriers to American Leadership in Artificial Intelligence", reads as if it were written by the owner of an AI company that is all too aware that the bubble is about to burst, and the scam about to end, in much the same way that the "Bored Ape Yacht Club" NFT scam recently collapsed.

And, to be fair, this concern is well-warranted. The development of the high-parameter large language models has succeeded only in producing streams of data that are statistically likely to sound like plausible information, and as such are only slightly more useful than a Donald Trump campaign speech. The output they generate is essentially what a smart person sounds like to a stupid person. Their value is therefore a tiny fraction of their cost, which is why AI companies are lobbying the White House for what is essentially a bailout.

For years, conservative politicians have assured us that the government should not be in the business of picking winners and losers, and even if reasonable people can disagree on this, we should not be picking this particular loser.
