I am writing to express my concern about OpenAI's history of and stated desire to violate copyright law. If I, as a high school English teacher in a cash-strapped public school, cannot copy entire texts to educate my very real, human students, then they have no business doing it to educate an artificial intelligence.

I don't just practice fair use - I teach it my students to use it, so I find it ridiculous that Mr. Altman is incapable of understanding concepts (like limited scope, transformation, attribution, and a basic requirement to not make money off of someone else's work) my tenth-graders have mastered.

If his product cannot exist without stealing from artists, writers, and musicians, then perhaps his product should not exist.

Thank you,
Jennifer Smyth
