If a business cannot be viable without stealing protected original thought, then it should not be viable. If the AI industry's only path to creating viable, competitive products is to train their LLMs on copyrighted material, without permission, and clearly outside of the definition and spirit of the Free Use Doctrine, the government should not bend the law to the detriment of countless copyright holders in order to prop up a technology built on stolen material, especially one that has failed to return even the smallest modicum of value on the tremendous investment it has received, and which has also exponentially increased its use of precious natural resources to no tangible benefit for anyone except investors artificially inflating the valuation of this vaporware.

DO NOT allow AI companies to tread on copyright holders. If these companies have the potential for the world-changing economic impact they love to tout to loudly in order to raise funds, then they can use those funds to properly license the copyrighted works they claim to need.
