To Whom it May Concern,

My name is Jordan Taylor and I am a Japanese to English literary translator, as well as an artist.

GenAI is massively flawed as a system to be used for literary translation, but people unaware of how it actually works push for it to be implemented, resulting in sub-par results that have to be checked by someone who can read both languages anyway, often requiring more time than if it was translated by a human in the first place (unless the client accepts a lower quality).

Completely reliable machine translation will not be possible until we achieve AGI, as the AI will need to be able to determine when the source text lacks all the information and where that missing information can be found, as well as make actual decisions about what is most important about the text and what is all right to sacrifice.

I also cannot accept the ethically questionable act of using a tool trained without permission on other people's work, or the increased burden on our environment through its power demands, especially considering its poor quality.

We must protect artists' and creators' work and livelihood, otherwise we will lose all human creation. Even if AI only replaces "low-end" jobs, that will eventually require it to replace all creative jobs as those low-end jobs are where beginners hone their skills in order to someday become experts. The death of the beginner is the eventual death of the expert.

As such, I strongly urge you to implement policies to protect individual creators and their work.

Best regards,

Jordan Taylor
