AI should not be able to take from creators without compensating and having contracts for their work. AI is not human. It cannot be inspired. It brings nothing new to the table, no new insights, no life experiences to add. It only takes, and mashes. People can read all the same material as AI, they can see all the same paintings, but people have lives outside of art. They have friends and thoughts and parents and longings and opinions. They have embarrassments and fears and things computers cannot have on their own and cannot grasp. If someone created art that was just a mash up of characters that exist in copyright it would be illegal. Letting computers do this on a massive scale without permission should be illegal. It breaks the law but it also breaks the human contract of art, because art offers a take on the human experience for you to connect your human experience to. Both artist and observer must bring themselves to the art. AI cannot do that. Do not let the arts turn into cheap knockoffs with only garbled regurgitations of humanity. Arts are vital and human.
