Hello OSTP,

Please consider the following: AI consumes human output to develop the algorithms they claim mimic human creativity and craft. If you have no taste, it is possible that you may be fooled by this argument. But people with classical training and a deep connection to the best of the arts will instinctively understand that the "AI" champions of this age are simply too poor to appropriately compensate exceptional artists to inform their models (and too uncultured to recognize these artists in the first place!) This is why they are asking the government to foot the bill and destroy copyright. They cannot afford it.

In short, I urge you to maintain copyright rules in favor of humans. The financial poverty and poverty of culture experienced by so called "AI" companies is not a problem the government needs to solve.

With all due respect,
Keira Havens
