1st, the term AI needs much more definition as there is much hyperbole and exaggeration with the term and meaning of "Artificial Intelligence". Without a clear definition that we can all agree on, this may be a failed effort, at least as far as representing mankind. 2nd, If we are actually talking about machine and predictive learning, then lets discuss that as a step 1. As a Senior Software Engineer working in this area, and certified, I can tell you that machines do not learn by themselves. Machines are fed data elements, whether direct , labled, through connections to outside feeds, Deep learning and Predictive Analytics which is a groups determined view. There are always group of humans behind the curtain deciding what, or how those data feeds or predictions models occur. It is not difficult as the men behind the curtain to limit or increase data to that groups liking. I have worked with similar models. Machines can mimick human behavior based on labeled or predictive learning set up by a human. They excel in the speed to which a decision is formed but decisons are only formed by the data fed them and the coded results from that data. So, that is why folks are saying machine learning, predicted results or as some call it AI is potentially dangerous. Pure and Simple, Its all mans doing. Its only dangerous if designed that way, or designed without proper error handling, (like we have seen with self driving cars, where a parity bit or lack of can cause unfortunate results). Therefor Regulations are absolutely needed for "AI" and they need to be created and decided from both the House and Senate (BIPARTISAN representing the us population) and NOT from the man or group behind the curtain. We seem to be in a place where regulations are considered bad. I would agree that there are too many in some areas. There are however areas of human health and safety where they are absolutely needed to have a safe society and a society that believes and trusts government decisions. I would also caution that views from the business community, will in many cases, be in direct conflict of those from the American public and we do not want this "Race" to disregard and hurt the American public. Please Remember government is for the people by the people, not by business world, or not by the men behind the curtain.
