My name is Nicholas Fabricatore. AI is an undeniably powerful tool for computation and logic. It needs to be used in moderation. AI should be used for tasks that cannot be accomplished by humans, such as processing vast amounts of data. AI has massive possibilities, but if it continues being used as it has been, it is a threat to job security, the environment, and the education of future generations.

Employers will use artificial intelligence to complete work that used to be done by paid employees. Jobs like cashiers, teachers, artists, lawyers, and many more are under threat. As AI models become more advanced, they will be able to do much more, and thus will pose a larger threat to someone looking for employment. The working class will suffer if regulations are not put on the use of AI for companies, corporations, and businesses.

Secondly, AI has a massive environmental impact. At a time when our planet is hanging in the balance, we should not be embracing a technology that puts more carbon into the atmosphere.

Lastly, the ease of access to AI has corroded independent thought. We need to stop embracing AI everywhere so we as a society have time to consider the ramifications of offloading the task of thinking onto a machine. Students are using AI to breeze through classes, and when they need to apply knowledge or think critically, they'll have forgotten how.

AI is going to require careful consideration going forward, and the needs of the many should be weighed over the needs of the wealthy few.
