I work in the design and technology industry and my day to day often interacts with AI software and discussions. I'm commenting on OpenAI claiming they can not continue without removing copywrite law. Their request is insulting to human creation and is little more than a private tech firm begging for a bail out by permanently destroying any protections that we have for every writer, artist, filmmaker, and worthwhile creative endeavor. This is happening because they can't hit their investment targets if they have to follow laws. They can't afford to navigate inherent training issues in AI development if they have to pay for copywrite materials. It's beyond insulting, but it's also very dangerous and would serve no purpose other than to stratify wealth further away from Americans and give it to a tech billionaire. Other companies like Google are latching onto this call, not out of the benefit it would bring to society, but because they realize how much money they will make when they no longer have to pay Americans for the things we produce. They would become digital pirates protected under the law, and all of us would become their victims.
